Did you used to feel like hot stuff wearing your best leisure suit and partying hard at Uncle Sam’s in Levittown? Or maybe you’d put on your boogie shoes and head to Cherry’s in Glen Cove?

Sure, in the 1970s the bigger and harder-to-get-into clubs were in Manhattan. But those looking for a more relaxed (but still funky) time found ample places to catch night fever right here on Long Island. Haunts like Decameron in Levittown, 2001 in East Islip and LGBTQ refuges like Club Swamp in Wainscott offered spaces with rhythmic sounds and a respite from the real world. Disco began as an escapist subculture born out of Black and Latino music, but had become full-blown suburban mainstream by the late 1970s.
